2019 HURRICANE PREPAREDNESS

OFFICIAL SOUTH CAROLINA HURRICANE GUIDE IS AVAILABLE

South Carolina's emergency management program minimizes loss of life and property damage from all hazard incidents.

The SC Emergency Management Division urges people and businesses to begin preparations ahead of the 2019 Hurricane Season, which starts in June. Planning can safeguard lives, protect property and lessen the devastating impacts of tropical storms and hurricanes, which threaten all areas of South Carolina.

“Now is the time to get ready for whatever the next few months might hold,” said Derrec Becker, Chief of Public Information & External Affairs for the South Carolina Emergency Management Division.

A lot of rain quickly produces the potential for flash flooding, he added. Flooding from widespread, torrential rains is one of the most deadly and destructive hazards associated with hurricanes. High winds and tornadoes can cause severe damage to buildings and property.

“The entire state is susceptible to hurricanes. Even the areas not on the coast are subject to high winds and flooding,” Becker explained.

Emergency managers urge people to update their plans, develop a disaster supply kit, review insurance policies and talk with their family about what could happen during a disaster.

The national weather service is predicting an average year, but the last four years were anything but average.

In 2018, South Carolina narrowly escaped a direct hit from Hurricane Florence, which dumped so much rain that the entire state was flooded for weeks. Hurricane Irma hit in 2017, Hurricane Matthew blew through in 2016, and the Historic Flood of 2015 left lasting destruction.

“We’ve already had one named storm just off the coast of South Carolina,” Becker said, adding that the greatest danger is not from high winds, but from flooding.

“Never try to drive or walk through water. Flooding is the biggest killer, but people don’t take it seriously. It is 100 percent unsafe.” Hurricane Florence produced nine fatalities, which the historic flood caused 10 deaths.

One reason for more flooding is that homes and communities are being built in flood plains. “Water will go where it wants to go, regardless of whether you’re standing in its way,” Becker said. The state’s evacuation zones are based on estimated storm surge levels. The Low Country is named that for a reason.

People should be their own emergency managers, Becker said. “Our theme is ‘Grab a guide, get the app, have a plan, and make it personal.’ ”

While any named storms are cause for concern, SCEMD is focused on the ones headed to South Carolina.

People need a kit with enough provisions for the whole family to live on for at least a week. An extra phone charger or solar pack is valuable to have. Becker suggests that people add items over time, so they have enough on hand before the emergency comes. Backup power is always a good idea.

Think about livestock and pets, he urged. Farmers should review emergency plans for livestock, such as how to transport them or how to protect them if they are left in place. Animals need to be able to get to food and water.

The official updated 2019 South Carolina Hurricane Guide details useful information on what residents should do before, during and after the landfall of a major hurricane. It includes updated evacuation zone information.

Residents can prepare for the hurricane season in a number of ways:

- Create an emergency plan by visiting scemd.org or downloading the SC Emergency Manager mobile app: onelink.to/dn92rx
- Have an emergency kit based on checklists in the 2019 SC Hurricane Guide.
- Review your insurance policy to see what is covered and what is not.
- Have plans for pets and livestock.

HOMEGROWN BY HEROES

Here in South Carolina we love our veterans! That means trying to support them in any way that we can. Purchasing fruits, vegetables, and other products grown by our neighboring veteran farmers is a tangible way that we can support them.

The Homegrown by Heroes initiative was started with just this in mind. With many veterans returning home to rural backgrounds, these folks—men and women—either take over family farms, start their own, or begin working on the farm.

The Homegrown by Heroes initiative helps to differentiate veteran-produced products, which allows consumers to support them. It also allows veterans to tell their stories. Just a few weeks ago, Blanche and I, along with several SCDA staff members, attended a dinner at the City Roots farm in Columbia that raised money to support a farm that was engaged in training vets that had returned home. All of the chefs were ‘veteran chefs’, and it was a great evening.

Here at SCDA we are partnering with the Farmer Veteran Coalition to provide a logo that can help put a brand on products produced by veterans. This logo will help us knowingly and deliberately support our local farmer veterans.

The Farmer Veteran Coalition is the nation’s largest nonprofit organization that was formed to assist farmers in pursuit of a career in agriculture. It provides aid to veteran farmers in all capacities. Whether through its mentorship program, financial planning, or farm education, they want to help.

If you are currently serving in the US military, or if you are a veteran farming here in South Carolina, then you may be eligible for this initiative.

Eligibility requirements are simple. In addition to being a veteran of any branch of the U.S. military, your farm or agribusiness must maintain 50 percent veteran ownership or management.

Farmers who participate will have access to educational programs and services and to discounts from suppliers and service providers.

Whether it is by putting the Homegrown by Heroes logo on your products, or becoming a member of the Farmer Veteran Coalition, our goal is to make sure that South Carolina veteran farmers are supported and able to serve our country again by providing food for our state.

You can find more information by giving us a call at (803) 734-2210, by going to the SCDA website (agriculture.sc.gov), or by visiting the Farmer Veteran Coalition website (farmvetco.org).

Let’s all do our part to support our veterans. They certainly have supported all of us!

ROBOTS MAY HELP FILL AGRICULTURAL LABOR GAP

Clemson University researchers believe robots can provide valuable assistance to agriculture. Photo by Clemson Public Service and Agriculture

BLACKVILLE – The agricultural workforce is shrinking, and some Clemson University researchers believe robots may help provide a means to protect America’s food and fiber industries.

Several researchers met recently with representatives from Clearpath Robotics to learn how to equip robots to work in agricultural crops.

“Robots are becoming more integrated into the manufacturing industry,” said Joe Mari Maja, a research sensor engineer at Clemson’s Edisto Research and Education Center. “Recent advances on sensors and technology provide an interesting outlook on how robots will be working outdoors with humans.”

Using small unmanned ground vehicles (UGV) or mobile ground robots provides a platform to increase farm management efficiency, Maja said. The platform can be retrofitted with different components to perform specific tasks, such as spraying, scouting, remote-sensing, quantifying plant properties and harvesting.

Maja is studying how to use a robot for selective cotton harvesting and weeding. He and his staff retrofitted a robot with a vacuum-type system with a small storage bin. Having a robotic cotton harvester would be a great help for cotton farmers, he said.

“The cotton harvester robot was successfully assembled and tested on a field,” Maja said. “Several adjustments, calibrations, reconfigurations and tests will be conducted to help us improve this technology so that it can be used.”

The United States is the third largest cotton-producing country in the world, behind India and China. American cotton farmers need to be able to increase production efficiency while reducing labor costs. Using cotton harvesting machines is one way farmers can reduce labor costs and still pick cotton as soon as the bolls open.

Robotic cotton harvesters are expected to cost less than traditional farm equipment. Harvesting machines can cost as much as $700,000, compared to an anticipated $4,000 for robotic cotton harvester prototypes.
